Findings of Facts & Conclusions of Law

John McLaughlin appeared for the Petitioner. Nora Brown appeared for the named Respondent charged with two violations of NYC Adm code §24-163 for idling a vehicle for more than three minutes.

The Petitioner submitted a video for each summons showing the truck idling for more than three minutes and several other documents and then rested on the sworn details of violation. (Pet. exhs.1-2).

Respondent moved to dismiss the charge arguing that they had a city issued variance (Resp. exh. A) which allowed them to idle their vehicles.

For both summonses, Petitioner argued that the variance did not apply because the video failed to show any active work, and no evidence that money was being transferred.

Respondent argued that the fact that no activity was captured during the time period in the video does not prove that there was no active work going on. Respondent stated that in the video for summons ending 21Z, a bank was clearly visible across the street.

I credit the Respondent and find that they have established that they had a variance that was valid at the time of observation.

Petitioner has failed to provide substantial credible evidence that the workers were not performing their duties, during the time of observation.

The summonses are therefore dismissed.
